

THE LONGEST DECADE

In the 1990s, Paul Keating and John Howard altered Australia's predictable economic script of bust, boom, and bust. This insider's look at Australian politics suggests that, despite their competing visions for Australia, Keating and Howard are the twin architects of the political, economic, and social revolution...

Peek Inside the Book

Genuine change, in the national interest, comes about only when a government forces its rusted-on supporters to give something up as the coalition did on guns, and Labor did on protection. George Megalogenis,...

Reader's Opinions

An interesting review of personalities and policies in Australian politics centring around the relationship between John Howard and Paul Keating. The direct quotes of each at the end of the...

A good history of the economic side of the Keating and Howard years; we tend to see Keating and Howard as polar opposites, but as far as economics goes, they were more or less on the same page - both were neoclassicists who felt that deregulation of the economy was necessary for it to compete, with some differences in emphasis (WorkChoices,...
